It was the one desire of Lady Thetford s heart; but she never said to her son, who loved her dearly, and would have done a great deal to add to her happiness. She left it to fate, and leaving it, was doing the wisest thing she could possibly do. It seemed as if her hopes were likely to be realized. Sir Rupert had an artist s and a Sybarite s love for all things beautiful, and could appreciate the grand statuesque style of Miss Jocyn s beauty, even as his mother could not appreciate it. She was like the Pallas Athine, she was his ideal woman, fair and proud, uplifted and serene, smiling on all, from the heights of high-and-mightydom, but shining upon them, a brilliant far-off star, keeping her warmth and sweetness all for him. He was an indolent, dreamy Sybarite, this pale young baronet, who liked his rose-leaves unruffled...
